

Roblox Racing Wrap Competition

Build Submarines × Roblox Driving Empire · Exported July 27, 2026

01 — ASSIGNMENT SUMMARY

BuildSubmarines.com sponsors a real NASCAR stock car. That car lives a double life: in the physical world it races on asphalt at full speed; inside Roblox's Driving Empire, it exists as a playable, drivable game asset enjoyed by millions of young players every day. We are activating the intersection of those two worlds.

The assignment is a paint scheme design contest. From June 19 through July 20, players are invited to design their own livery for the BuildSubmarines.com NASCAR car. The winning design doesn't just win a prize — it gets applied to the actual, physical NASCAR race car.

This is not a banner ad or a sponsored stream. It is a genuine creative competition that turns passive players into active participants.

02 — SUCCESS METRICS

5,000	Total Contest Submissions — Primary KPI. The number that anchors the case study and fuels the media pitch. Recommended baseline target.
10+	Earned Media Placements — Secondary KPI. Distinct placements across gaming press (IGN, Kotaku), motorsport media (Racer, NASCAR.com), and defense / workforce trade publications.

“Every dollar spent and every creative decision made should be evaluated against one question: does this move the submission number?”

03 — TARGET AUDIENCE

The Young Builder

A quietly serious maker who has spent years getting genuinely good at designing things inside games, and is only beginning to suspect — with equal parts hunger and anxiety — that the skills they've been building in private might have a place in the real world.

AGE	14
PLATFORM	Roblox — Driving Empire, daily
DAILY TIME IN-GAME	2.4+ hours
SELF-IDENTITY	Creator, not gamer
CAREER	Undecided — window still open
BRAND LINK	Drives the car. Doesn't know why it exists.

What Stops Them

- The campaign voice reads as a corporate recruitment ad that wandered into Roblox — dismissed before the second sentence.
- The submission process requires too many steps outside the game. Every friction point between intent and submission is a real dropout risk.
- Confidence, not skill, is the barrier — the campaign must signal that a bold, clean idea is legitimately competitive.

04 — CORE INSIGHT

The next generation of builders is already building — they're just doing it inside games.

The same curiosity and craft that drives a 14-year-old to spend hours perfecting a car livery in Roblox is the same curiosity and craft that makes a great engineer, welder, or designer. The skills are adjacent. The mindset is identical. BuildSubmarines.com doesn't need to convince young people to become builders — they already are. It just needs to show them that the real world has a place for that instinct. One million organic minutes in the car, with zero recruitment messaging, is the proof the audience is already there. This contest is the proof of claim.

TERRITORY 01

Your Screen Builds Real Things

The distance between what you build on a screen and what gets built in the world is smaller than you think — and this contest proves it. The player who has spent hundreds of hours customizing vehicles isn't playing pretend. They're practicing.

Strategic role. Brand revelation. This route doesn't recruit — it recontextualizes. It takes something the audience already does and reflects it back as proof of something larger. The territory most capable of generating earned affinity rather than transactional engagement.

Cultural tension. The most digitally native generation in history is quietly retreating toward the tangible. The tension isn't screen vs. real life — it's the ache to know that what you do digitally can have weight in the world.

TERRITORY 02

Built to Outlive the Feed

Almost everything this audience makes disappears. A TikTok scrolls past. A Reel gets buried. A Roblox session resets. This contest produces the opposite: a winning design applied to a real, physical car that runs at full speed in front of cameras and crowds — the rare creative output that does not vanish.

Strategic role. Permanence as the prize. This route reframes the contest from exposure into evidence — material proof that what you make has weight in the world. The brand isn't asking for attention; it's offering durability.

Cultural tension. Gen Z's creative output is the most prolific in human history and the most easily forgotten — created inside systems engineered to erase it. The longing for something that doesn't scroll away is real.
